Federalism & Separation of Powers

A Return to “the Heady Days”?
The Supreme Court Addresses Whether the Bivens Doctrine Should Extend to Employees of Government Contractors in Minneci v. Pollard

By Robert T. Numbers, II* and Lisa L. Dixon

I. Introduction

On November 1, 2011, the Supreme Court heard oral arguments in Minneci v. Pollard, a case that will determine whether employees of government contractors can be held liable for damages for alleged constitutional violations under Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics and its progeny.1 Minneci should resolve a circuit split between the Ninth Circuit, which held that employees of government contractors can be held liable under Bivens, and the Fourth, Tenth, and Eleventh Circuits, which held that they could not. In resolving this circuit split, the Supreme Court will need to address a number of questions that have divided lower courts for many years, such as whether employees of governmental contractors are considered federal actors; whether recognition of a Bivens claim is precluded if a plaintiff has alternative remedies, even if those remedies are not congressionally crafted; and how the imposition of asymmetrical liability costs on government contractors impacts availability of a Bivens remedy.

II. Overview of Existing Case Law

The Supreme Court’s opinion in Minneci, regardless of which way it is decided, should resolve a question left undecided in Correctional Services Corp. v. Malesko.2 In Malesko, a divided Supreme Court3 held that inmates in privately-operated correctional facilities could not bring a Bivens claim against the corporation that operated the facility.4

The Supreme Court found that extending Bivens liability to private corporations would not advance Bivens’ goal “to deter individual federal officers from committing constitutional violations.”5 Allowing liability against an employer would undermine Bivens’ deterrent effect because “if a corporate defendant is available for suit, claimants will focus their collection efforts on it, and not the individual directly responsible for the alleged injury.”6

Additionally, the Court reasoned that extending Bivens to private corporations was in all meaningful aspects the same as allowing liability against the federal agency that employed an offending federal officer, a proposition the Supreme Court rejected in FDIC v. Meyer.7 An alternative outcome would provide inmates in privately-operated facilities with a superior remedy to those enjoyed by inmates in government-operated facilities.8 The Supreme Court explained that “[w]hether it makes sense to impose asymmetrical liability costs on private prison facilities alone is a question for Congress, not us, to decide.”9

This concern over asymmetrical liability costs was a central factor in the Supreme Court’s other main reason for refusing to extend Bivens to private corporations. Because inmates in privately-operated facilities could bring claims under state tort law, they “enjoy a parallel tort remedy that is unavailable to prisoners housed in Government facilities.”10 The existence of “alternative remedies [that] are at least as great, and in many respects greater, than anything that could be had under Bivens”11 counseled against the “marked extension of Bivens”12 sought by the plaintiff. The Supreme Court also noted that like inmates in facilities operated by the Bureau of Prisons, inmates in private facilities could bring concerns over their conditions of confinement to the attention of the BOP either through suits against the BOP for injunctive relief in federal courts or the BOP’s Administrative Remedy Program.13

Although Malesko resolved the issue of whether a Bivens remedy was available against a private company that operates a correctional facility, both sides of the opinion recognized that they were not addressing whether the individual employees of the private contractor could be held liable under Bivens. The majority recognized that Malesko was not “seek[ing] a cause of action against an individual officer” as in prior cases extending Bivens.14 Similarly, the dissent noted that “the question [of] whether a Bivens action would lie against the individual employee of a private corporation . . . is not raised in the present case.”15

This open question regarding the liability of the employees of private contractors has vexed the lower courts for years: divided panels of the Fourth and Tenth Circuits and a unanimous panel of the Eleventh Circuit determined a Bivens remedy was not available, while a divided panel of the Ninth Circuit recently recognized a Bivens remedy against the employees of government contractors.

A. An Equally Divided Tenth Circuit Holds that Employees of Private Contractors Are Not Subject to Liability Under Bivens in Peoples v. CCA Detention Centers

Cornelius E. Peoples filed two Bivens complaints regarding his pretrial detention in a federal prison operated by CCA, a private, for-profit corporation.16 In the first complaint (Peoples I), Peoples described how he feared attack by members of the “Mexican Mafia.”17 Despite filing formal and informal grievances, he was placed in the same prison unit as the

* Mr. Numbers is an attorney at Womble Carlyle Sandridge & Rice, PLLC in Raleigh, North Carolina. His practice focuses on civil rights litigation, business litigation, and appellate matters. Mr. Numbers frequently represents The GEO Group, Inc. and its employees in litigation in North Carolina that involves the question at issue in Minneci. However, Mr. Numbers does not represent The GEO Group, Inc. or its employees in Minneci.

 Mrs. Dixon lives in Winston-Salem, North Carolina, and has a J.D. from the University of Virginia School of Law.
Mexican Mafia members and was not transferred to a new unit until after he was physically assaulted twice. In the second complaint (Peoples II), he described how CCA had kept him in administrative segregation, where he did not have access to a law library, for thirteen months. He did not receive written notice of the reasons for administrative segregation immediately, and he did not receive a hearing for five months. He also believed that his phone calls with his attorney were unconstitutionally monitored.

Citing Malesko, the district court dismissed Peoples I for lack of subject matter jurisdiction, as the availability of other remedies precluded a Bivens claim. A different judge on the district court dismissed Peoples II on different grounds after assuming that a Bivens claim against the individual defendants was available, as the Tenth Circuit had not addressed the issue. Peoples timely appealed both dismissals, and the Tenth Circuit considered them together.

After noting that the availability of a Bivens claim was not a jurisdictional question but a remedies question, the Tenth Circuit panel held that a Bivens claim does not exist against individual employees of a private corporation operating a federal prison. As no courts of appeals had considered whether the existence of a state-law remedy precluded the extension of Bivens to employees of privately-operated prisons in the four years since Malesko, the court looked at two district court opinions. In Sarro v. Cornell Corrections, Inc., the Rhode Island district court held that while under Malesko a prisoner could not sue the corporation that operated the prison, the prisoner could sue the corporation’s employees. The Sarro court reasoned that this served the core purpose of Bivens, which was to deter individuals; that this would create parity among guards in federally-operated prisons and guards in privately-operated prisons; that no federal remedies were available to prisoners in pretrial detention like Sarro; and that allowing the availability of a Bivens remedy to rest on the availability of a state tort remedy would make federal prisoners’ remedies vary by state, which Bivens sought to avoid.

In Peoples I, the court held that under Malesko, a Bivens claim was only available when the prisoner had no alternative remedy. Therefore, the availability of a state tort remedy precluded allowing a Bivens claim against individual employees of a private prison operator. The Tenth Circuit adopted the analysis of Peoples I, basing its opinion on the limited circumstances in which a Bivens action is available, as described in Malesko. The availability of an alternative state tort remedy removed Peoples from the category of plaintiffs who may pursue a Bivens claim. The court also noted that whatever asymmetries in liability between federally- and privately-operated prisons existed, they were not created by the court; instead, the court maintained the status quo. While there were policy reasons to extend Bivens liability to individual employees of private corporations operating federal prisons, the decision to do so is best left to Congress.

Judge Ebel’s dissent argued that the only “alternate ‘cause of action’ sufficient to preclude a Bivens action must be a constitutional cause of action.” Thus, state law tort remedy is insufficient. Malesko is best read as preserving Bivens claims against private individuals. The best way to promote federal-state and public-private parallelism is through allowing suits against private individuals, as allowed under § 1983. Allowing suits against individuals would provide uniformity of liability instead of making the protection of prisoners’ constitutional rights “depend on the varying contours of state law” and on the facts. And finally, the goal of individual deterrence embodied in the Bivens remedy is undermined by not allowing federal prisoners to sue individual private prison operators.

The issue was eventually addressed by the Tenth Circuit en banc. However, the en banc court was evenly divided on the issue, which meant that while the district court’s dismissal of the claim was affirmed, the case carried no precedential value.

B. The Fourth Circuit Agrees that a Bivens Remedy Is Unavailable but Is Divided over Whether GEO’s Employees Are Federal Actors in Holly v. Scott

Ricky Holly, an inmate incarcerated at Rivers Correctional Institution in Winton, North Carolina, claimed that GEO’s employees violated his Eighth Amendment rights by failing to properly treat his diabetes. Holly brought suit under Bivens against the facility’s warden and his treating physician. The defendants were “both employed directly by GEO, and thus the only link between their employment and the federal government is GEO’s contract with the BOP.” At the district court level, the defendants unsuccessfully sought to have Holly’s claim dismissed on the basis that as employees of a private corporation they were not subject to liability under Bivens.

On appeal, a divided panel of the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals reversed the district court’s ruling and held that GEO’s employees were not subject to suit under Bivens. The majority opinion, authored by Judge J. Harvie Wilkinson and joined by Judge R. Bryan Harwell of the United States District Court of South Carolina (sitting by designation), began by reviewing the Supreme Court’s reluctance to expand the Bivens doctrine almost since its inception. This reluctance is based in part on the fact that “a decision to create a private right of action is one better left to legislative judgment in the great majority of cases.” Moreover, as Congress established the statutory provisions that allowed inmates to be housed in private facilities based on “the belief that private management would in some circumstances have comparative advantages in terms of cost, efficiency, and quality of service . . . adding a federal damages remedy to existing avenues of inmate relief might well frustrate a clearly expressed congressional policy.”

In the majority’s view, extending Bivens to GEO’s employees was precluded by two factors. First, defendants are private individuals, not government actors. Second, Holly has an adequate remedy against defendants for his alleged injuries under state law.

The defendants’ status as private individuals was a key aspect of the Court’s analysis because of “the importance of a party’s private status in our constitutional scheme. The Bill of Rights is a negative proscription on public action—to simply apply it to private action is to obliterate a fundamental fact of our political order.” Restricting the applicability of the Bill of Rights to public action “preserv[es] an area of individual freedom by limiting the reach of federal law and federal judicial power.” By maintaining this distinction between public and private action, courts “maintain the Bill of Rights as a shield.
that protects private citizens from the excesses of government, rather than a sword that they may use to impose liability upon one another.”

Although the Court “harbor[ed] some doubt as to whether such liability would ever be appropriate,” it went on to analyze whether the GEO defendants could be considered federal actors under the “state action” doctrine applied to constitutional claims under Section 1983.46 The Court undertook this analysis despite the fact that “the Supreme Court ‘ha[s] never held that the contours of Bivens and § 1983 are identical.’”49

Ultimately, the Court found that GEO’s employees are not federal actors under the public function test because they did not exercise powers traditionally reserved to the state.50 In reaching this conclusion, the majority focused on the Supreme Court’s determination in Richardson v. McKnight51 that the operation of correctional facilities was not a traditional public function because “the private operation of jails and prisons existed in the United States in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries and in England, the practice dated back to the Middle Ages.”52 As Holly’s alleged injury arose “out of defendants’ operation of the prison [and] not the fact of Holly’s incarceration,” the defendants did not engage in a traditionally public function and therefore were not federal actors subject to Bivens liability.53

The Fourth Circuit also rejected Holly’s contention that the Supreme Court’s holding in West v. Atkins54 required the court to find that “the provision of medical care to an inmate is always a public function, regardless of what entity operates the correctional facility where he is housed.”55 In West, the Supreme Court held that “a physician employed by North Carolina to provide medical services to state prison inmates [] acted under color of state law for purposes of § 1983.”56 The crucial distinction, according to the Fourth Circuit, was that “in this case the defendants had no direct relationship with the governmental entity.”57 The Court could not conclude “that provision of medical care in a private prison is somehow a ‘public function’ while maintaining fidelity to Richardson that the prison’s general operation is not.”58

The Court also held that the existence of adequate, and perhaps superior, state tort remedies precluded an extension of Bivens. According to the majority, the Supreme Court has only extended Bivens in situations where the plaintiff lacked any alternative remedy against the allegedly offending individual.59 Here “North Carolina law . . . supplies Holly with multiple claims against the individual defendants.”60 Thus, there was no need to recognize a Bivens claim against the GEO defendants.

Judge Dianna Gribbon Motz filed an opinion that, while concurring in judgment, vehemently disagreed with the majority’s analysis of the federal actor issue. Under Judge Motz’s analysis, the question was foreclosed by the Supreme Court’s holding in West. She believed that the defendants qualified as federal actors because they “perform a public function delegated to them by the federal government, and they assume the necessary obligations inherent in that function.”61 However, Judge Motz concurred in the judgment because the availability of adequate state remedies precluded recognition of a new Bivens cause of action.62

C. The Eleventh Circuit Determines that the Presence of Adequate State Remedies Precludes a Bivens Claim in Alba v. Montford

Luis Francisco Alba filed a Bivens suit against individual employees of Corrections Corporation of America (“CCA”), a private corporation that operated the federal prison in Georgia in which he was incarcerated.63 He alleged that, pursuant to a CCA policy, the employees failed to provide him with proper post-operative treatment after surgery for a benign goiter in his throat.64 The district court dismissed Alba’s claim at the initial screening stage because, as Alba had “adequate remedies in state court,” it failed to state a Bivens claim.65

The Eleventh Circuit assumed without deciding that CCA was a government actor, but it unanimously agreed with the district court that the availability of remedies under state tort law rendered a Bivens claim unavailable.66 An alternative remedy sufficient to defeat a Bivens claim does not have to be a federal remedy because Malesko rejected that argument and because the Bivens court expressed concern that Bivens would not be able to recover under state tort law.67 Georgia tort law in this instance was not inconsistent with the rights protected by the Eighth Amendment and even provided Alba with superior means of recovery.68 The circuit also noted that, while Alba did not sue CCA, he was challenging CCA’s policy instead of the conduct of the individual employees, and the Supreme Court “made it abundantly clear” in Malesko that “Bivens will not support an action challenging the conduct or policy of a non-individual defendant.”69

D. The Ninth Circuit Holds that GEO’s Employees Are Subject to Liability Under Bivens in Pollard v. Minneci

In 2001, Richard Pollard,70 a federal inmate, was incarcerated at Federal Correctional Institution at Taft in California, a facility operated by the GEO Group, Inc.71 pursuant to a contract with the Federal Bureau of Prisons.72 On April 7, 2001, Pollard slipped and fell on a cart left in a doorway while working in the facility’s butcher shop.73 The facility medical staff took x-rays and determined that Pollard may have fractured both of his elbows.74 He was placed in a bilateral sling and referred to an orthopedic clinic outside of the facility.75

As Pollard prepared to leave the facility for his orthopedic appointment, facility staff ordered him to put on a prison jumpsuit.76 Although Pollard claimed that, as a result of the injuries to his elbows, putting his arms through the sleeves of the jumpsuit “would cause him excruciating pain,” he was required to do so before leaving the facility.77 Additionally, Pollard was required to wear a “black box” restraining device on his wrists despite complaints about the pain caused by the device.78

The orthopedist who saw Pollard diagnosed him with “serious injuries to his elbows and recommended that his left elbow be put into a posterior splint for approximately two weeks.”79 However, when Pollard returned to the facility he was told that “due to limitations in staffing and facilities” he would not receive the treatment recommended by the orthopedist.80 Pollard also claimed that over the next several weeks facility staff failed to make accommodations that would allow him to feed or bathe himself, that he was required to work in spite of his injuries, and that he was required to wear the “black box” device before he was allowed to go to a follow-up appointment with his orthopedist.91

Pollard, proceeding pro se, filed suit in the Eastern District of California against GEO and a number of GEO’s employees. The complaint sought monetary damages from the defendants under Bivens for a violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. The district court dismissed the GEO suit based on the Supreme Court’s holding in Malesko,82 and subsequently dismissed the suit against the GEO employees based on the Tenth Circuit’s holding in Peoples and the Fourth Circuit’s holding in Holly.83

Pollard, now represented by counsel, appealed the dismissal to the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals. A divided three-judge panel of the Ninth Circuit84 reversed the district court’s holding with respect to GEO’s employees. The majority opinion, authored by Judge Paez and joined by Judge Hug, took direct aim at the reasoning of the various decisions that rejected an extension of Bivens, focusing most of its energy on the Fourth Circuit’s decision in Holly.85 Ultimately, the majority opinion held that Pollard should be able to bring a Bivens claim against GEO’s employees because “(1) the GEO employees act under color of federal law for purpose of Bivens liability and (2) the availability of a state tort remedy does not preclude Pollard’s ability to seek redress under Bivens.”86

The majority determined that GEO’s employees are federal actors based on a review of the “state action” principles developed by the Supreme Court in suits brought under 42 U.S.C. § 1983.87 The majority did not explain why it is applying the state action principles developed under Section 1983 other than to say that both the Ninth Circuit and “[o]ther circuits have . . . recognized the similarity of the § 1983 and Bivens doctrines.”88

In order to determine whether GEO’s employees were engaged in “state action,” the majority applied the “variation” of the public function test applied by the Supreme Court in West.89 Under this test, a private employee is a state actor and subject to liability under Section 1983 if the employee is “fully vested with state authority to fulfill essential aspects of the state’s constitutionally-imposed responsibilities.”90 According to the majority, GEO’s employees must be federal actors, and therefore amenable to suit under Bivens, because “there is no principled difference to distinguish the activities of the GEO employees in this case from the governmental action identified in West.”91 Ultimately, GEO’s employees must be amenable to suit under Bivens because Pollard’s alleged constitutional “deprivation was caused . . . by the federal government’s exercise of its power to punish Pollard by incarceration and to deny him a venue independent of the federal government to obtain needed medical care.”92

The majority went on to explicitly reject what it considered the “illogical reading of West” employed by the Fourth Circuit in Holly.93 Under the majority’s reading of West, there is no distinction between the actions of a private individual working directly for the governmental entity and an individual who is working for a private corporation that has a contract with a governmental entity.94 West provides that “‘contracting out’ care ‘does not relieve’ the government of its ‘constitutional duty’ to provide adequate care or ‘deprive inmates of the means to vindicate their Eighth Amendment rights.’”95

The majority also found unconvincing the Fourth Circuit’s refusal to define GEO’s employees as federal actors due to their inability to raise the defense of qualified immunity based on the Supreme Court’s holding in Richardson.96 Initially, the Pollard majority rejected the Fourth Circuit’s reliance on this factor in its analysis because “the Court in Richardson expressly noted that it ‘did not address [] whether the defendants are liable under § 1983 even though they are employed by a private firm.’”97 But it goes on to assert that its determination that GEO’s employees are federal actors is correct because “in Malesko, the Supreme Court explicitly left open the possibility that private prison employees could act under the color of federal law and therefore face Bivens liability.”98

More central to the disagreements between the Ninth and Fourth Circuits was the question of the relevant function to be analyzed in determining whether GEO’s employees performed a public function.99 The Ninth Circuit rejected the Fourth Circuit’s determination that the incarceration of prisoners and the management of prisons were separate and distinct governmental functions based on West’s statement that a prisoners’ constitutional injury from inadequate medical care is “‘caused, in the sense relevant for state-action inquiry, by the State’s exercise of its right to punish [the prisoner] by incarceration.’”100 In the end, the Ninth Circuit decline[d] to artificially parse [the power to incarcerate] into its constituent parts—confinement, provision of food and medical care, protection of inmate safety, etc.—as that would ignore that those functions all derive from a single public function that is the sole province of the government: “enforcement of state-imposed deprivation of liberty.”101

As the power to incarcerate has been “traditionally the exclusive prerogative of the [government],” the Ninth Circuit determined that it was appropriate to hold that GEO’s employees were undertaking a public function.102

The Pollard majority then recognized that a judicially-created Bivens remedy is not necessarily required simply by the fact that it determined GEO’s employees to be federal actors.103 Before recognizing a new Bivens remedy, a court must also analyze (1) “whether any alternative existing process for protecting the [constitutionally recognized] interest amounts to a convincing reason for the Judicial Branch to refrain from providing a new and freestanding remedy in damages,” and (2) where there exist “any special factors counseling hesitation before authorizing a new kind of federal litigation.”104

The Pollard majority determined that the availability of state tort remedies to redress inmate injuries was insufficient to prohibit the court from recognizing a new Bivens remedy. Despite the Supreme Court’s specific language that Bivens remedies are only available in the absence of any alternative remedy, the Ninth Circuit determined that “the mere existence of a potential state law claim did not suffice to preclude a Bivens action.”105

The majority went on to hold that the existence of state tort remedies did not provide “convincing reasons” to refrain from recognizing a new Bivens claim for two primary reasons. Initially, the majority found that Congress’s failure to create a statutory remedy to address claims by federal inmates in privately-managed facilities counseled in favor of a judicially-created remedy. While the Ninth Circuit cites a number of cases in support of this proposition, the only case that directly deals with the issue is Carlson v. Green. Carlson is among those cases from the bygone era of “heady days in which the [Supreme] Court assumed common-law powers to create causes of action . . . ” Additionally, relying on Carlson and the Ninth Circuit’s opinion in Castaneda v. United States, an opinion rejected by the Supreme Court, the Ninth Circuit found that state tort remedies are insufficient to preclude a judicially-created Bivens remedy because the contours of the remedies available to each inmate will vary depending on which state the inmate’s claim arises.

November 2011

According to the Ninth Circuit, there were also no special factors counseling hesitation from recognizing a new Bivens remedy. Adopting a Bivens remedy for inmates in private facilities would produce a workable cause of action because under Eighth Amendment jurisprudence “the applicable standards are clear. There is no need for the district court to craft new standards or remedies to address Pollard’s claims.” The Ninth Circuit also held that recognizing a Bivens cause of action would enhance the doctrine’s core purpose of deterring individual officers from committing unconstitutional acts because (1) it would allow inmates to avoid liability caps, pre-filing certification requirements, and other limitations placed on state action; and (2) Bivens may allow for recovery of greater damages in some cases than a state tort law remedy. However, existence of these asymmetrical liability costs did not rise to such a level as to “counsel hesitation in recognizing a Bivens remedy here.”

Based upon its finding that GEO’s employees were federal actors, that inmates in privately-operated facilities lacked a sufficiently adequate remedy to preclude recognizing a Bivens remedy, and that there were no special factors counseling hesitation against recognizing such a claim, the majority reversed the district court’s decision and allowed Pollard’s Bivens claim against GEO’s employees to proceed.

Dissenting from the majority opinion, Judge Restani commented that “[t]he majority overlooks the reality that the Supreme Court has recognized Bivens causes of action only where federal officials, by virtue of their position, enjoy impunity, if not immunity, from damages liability because of gaps or exemptions in statutes or in the common law.” Such gaps did not exist in Pollard’s case because “his alternative remedies [under state tort law] are at least as great, and in many respects greater than anything that could be had under Bivens.” Given the existence of an adequate remedy to address Pollard’s alleged injury, “bedrock principles of separation of powers foreclose[] judicial imposition of a new substantive liability.” Judge Restani also noted that, contrary to the majority’s assertion, the Supreme Court has considered state tort remedies sufficient to preclude the recognition of a new Bivens remedy. Moreover, she asserted that “[i]t is to much of a stretch to infer, as the majority does,” that the Supreme Court would have reached the same result in Wilkie had the case involved a handful of state law tort claims instead of an amalgamation of state, federal, administrative, and judicial remedies. Moreover, there was no compelling need to ensure uniformity in this area of the law because employees of private entities do not receive the same immunities as federal officials and the basic elements of state law tort claims “are fundamentally the same in every state.”

Judge Restani also disagreed with the majority’s analysis regarding the presence of special factors counseling hesitation in recognizing a new type of Bivens claim. In her view, feasibility concerns did not counsel in favor of a Bivens remedy for all inmates in private facilities because “allowing a Bivens action to go forward only where a plaintiff would otherwise have no alternative remedy [under state law] is not unduly complicated,” and she could not conceive of any circumstances in which state tort law would not provide a remedy for an inmate’s claim. Additionally, Judge Restani did not believe that recognizing a Bivens cause of action would further the deterrence goals of Bivens because state law provided an adequate deterrent effect through awards of “compensatory and punitive damages for the same conduct . . . .” Finally, recognizing a Bivens cause of action would only exacerbate the existing asymmetrical liability costs between inmates in private and public facilities because of the increased types of claims that may be brought against the employees of private facilities and their lack of qualified immunity from Bivens claims.

Joining Judge Restani in her rejection of the majority’s opinion were the eight judges of the Ninth Circuit who dissented from the denial of the GEO defendants’ petition to have the matter heard en banc. Judge Bea and those who joined him believed that it was contrary to Supreme Court precedent to recognize a Bivens cause of action because “Pollard has a viable suit in state court against each of the jailor defendants under theories of intentional or negligent tort or medical malpractice.” Moreover, the dissenting judges found the majority’s concerns regarding lack of uniformity were misplaced because of the existence of “an adequate, and arguably superior, tort claim under state law.” Ultimately, the dissenting judges found that [t]he panel’s explanation for this disagreement [with other circuits] reduces to a policy judgment that plaintiffs in this situation should have another forum in which to pursue these claims even though an adequate state remedy exists. Whatever may be the merits of that policy judgment, it is for Congress, not us, to make.

III. Analysis

A review of the various circuit court opinions, and particularly Holly and Minneci, demonstrates where the fault lines are on this issue. First, there is a dispute over whether the employees of private corporations that operate correctional facilities constitute federal actors. Second, the courts disagree whether the availability of state tort remedies precludes the recognition of a Bivens remedy. Finally, there is controversy over whether and to what extent the difference between the private and public entities that operate correctional facilities impacts a court’s ability to recognize a Bivens remedy.
With regard to the federal actor question, there is a clear dispute over whether this question is governed by West's holding that governmental entities cannot contract away their constitutional responsibilities or Richardson's statement that the operation of correctional facilities is not a traditional public function.\textsuperscript{130} Interestingly, at the Supreme Court neither Minneci, nor the United States in its amicus brief in support of Minneci, spend any meaningful time discussing the federal actor issue. Minneci asserts that the resolution of this matter does not “require a determination of whether employees of private prison operators exercise governmental powers as a general matter.”\textsuperscript{131} Similarly, the United States indicates that “the Court need not reach this issue to decide this case,” but goes on to indicate that if the Court does take up the issue, “the government submits that private prison contractors do act ‘under color of law’ for certain purposes, including for purposes of federal criminal law.”\textsuperscript{132} Pollard does not make any arguments in support of the position that GEO’s employees are federal actors, but instead asserts that Minneci’s failure to address the issue constitutes a concession of that point.\textsuperscript{133} While Minneci and the United States are correct in their assertion that resolution of the federal actor issue is not necessary to resolve the case, addressing the issue of when private action reaches the level of government action could provide much-needed guidance on this unsettled question. This is particularly true in light of the reality that while Minneci only deals with prison operators, its reasoning will be employed in litigation involving government contractors beyond the corrections industry.

The courts of appeals disagree over whether the availability of state tort remedies preclude recognition of a Bivens claim. Primarily the dispute centers over whether congressionally-crafted remedies are the exclusive means of prohibiting a Bivens claim or whether any adequate remedy will do. According to the Ninth Circuit, only remedies crafted by Congress should be considered remedies adequate to defeat a Bivens cause of action: “The mere availability of a state law remedy does not counsel against allowing a Bivens cause of action. . . . Only remedies crafted by Congress can have such a preclusive effect.”\textsuperscript{134} The majorities in Holly, Peoples, and Alba held that the availability of any alternative remedy precludes a Bivens remedy: “[A] Bivens claim should not be implied unless the plaintiff has no other means of redress or unless he is seeking an otherwise nonexistent cause of action against the individual defendant.”\textsuperscript{135} The court’s judgment of what constitutes an adequate alternative remedy will be central to its decision.

Based upon the Supreme Court’s holdings in Malesko, where state tort law remedies seem to have been sufficient to bar a Bivens cause of action, it appears that Minneci has the better argument. However, the Ninth Circuit is correct in its statement that the Supreme Court has been less than clear on this point.\textsuperscript{136}

Regardless of how the Supreme Court resolves this matter, asymmetrical liability costs will exist between private and public providers of correctional services. If there is a Bivens remedy against the employees of privately-operated correctional facilities, inmates in these facilities will have both Bivens and state law claims at their disposal. In addition to having an additional set of claims, inmates in privately-operated facilities will have an easier path to recovery on their Bivens claims because the defendants will not be entitled to the defense of qualified immunity. A prisoner in a privately-operated prison would be able to recover damages from individual prison officials for violations that were not clearly established, while a prisoner in a federally-operated prison would not be able to recover for the same violation. Similarly, a prison official in a privately-operated prison would be subjected to personal liability in more situations than a prison official in a federally-operated prison due to the multiple causes of action available to plaintiffs. Of course, if the Supreme Court rejects the Ninth Circuit’s reasoning, inmates in privately-operated facilities will only be able to recover through state law claims. Either way inmates in privately-operated facilities are in a vastly different position than inmates in federally-operated facilities.

However, a case pending in the Eastern District of North Carolina has presented a potential route for inmates in privately-operated facilities to seek redress for constitutional violations. In Mathis v. The GEO Group, Inc.,\textsuperscript{137} the court has indicated that the Bureau of Prisons may be held liable for an Eighth Amendment violation if the BOP’s on-site contract monitor is aware of unconstitutional conduct by the contractor or its employees and is deliberately indifferent to the unconstitutional acts.\textsuperscript{138} Although Mathis does not involve a Bivens claim against the BOP’s on-site contract monitor, the potential exists that such a claim could be viable. If such a claim were recognized, it would address at least some of the concerns raised over the government contracting away its constitutional responsibilities.\textsuperscript{139}

Ultimately, the only way the asymmetrical liability issue can be addressed, barring some wholesale change in the law, is if Congress addresses the issue. Congress has the ability and the authority to produce a remedial scheme to address tortious conduct, both of a constitutional nature and otherwise, by both government contractors and their employees. A congressionally-crafted cause of action would, most likely, have the additional benefit of preempting state law tort claims, which would provide the uniformity of liability sought by those who support Pollard’s position.

Despite the existence of the controversy over the potential liability of the employees of government contractors for several years, Congress has shown neither the interest, nor the will, to act on this issue. It is unlikely that it will do so at any point in the near future and nearly certain that the issue will not be addressed prior to the Supreme Court resolving Minneci.

IV. Conclusion

A decision to uphold the Ninth Circuit could signal a shift in the Supreme Court’s approach to recognizing judicial causes of action. The Court may be less willing to wait for Congress to act to protect constitutional rights and more willing to fill in the gaps where Congress has been silent: a return to the “ready in which [courts] assumed common-law powers to create causes of action.”\textsuperscript{140} As in Davis and Carlson, it could also be a narrow expansion limited to the facts in Minneci and only apply to suits by prisoners against prison officials employed by a private corporation that operates a federal prison.
Practically, a decision upholding the Ninth Circuit could lead to increased costs in government contracting and increased litigation. If employees of government contractors may be subject to individual liability for possible constitutional violations, they will demand higher pay or indemnification, which will in turn drive up the cost of the contracts to the government. The courts will also face more suits filed by prisoners. Given the increasing number of prisons operated by private corporations, the number of Bivens suits could dramatically increase.\textsuperscript{141}

However, given the Supreme Court’s reluctance to expand Bivens,\textsuperscript{142} it is likely that the Court granted certiorari to undo the expansion of Bivens approved by the Ninth Circuit. The unavailability of the Bivens remedy where another adequate remedy is available is relatively uncontroversial, and this will likely provide a firm basis for the Supreme Court to agree with the Fourth, Tenth, and Eleventh Circuits and refuse to extend Bivens to individual employees of private prison operators.

Endnotes

1 403 U.S. 388 (1971).
3 Chief Justice Rehnquist authored the majority opinion and was joined by Justices O’Connor, Scalia, Kennedy, and Thomas. Justice Scalia wrote a concurring opinion, joined by Justice Thomas, that explained his broad rejection of the reasoning underlying Bivens and his desire to “limit Bivens and its two follow on cases to the precise circumstances they involved.” Id. at 524 (Scalia, J., concurring) (citations omitted). Justice Stevens filed a dissenting opinion, which was joined by Justices Souter, Ginsburg, and Breyer.
4 Id. at 63.
5 Id. at 70.
6 Id. at 71.
7 Id. at 70-71 (citing FDIC v. Meyer, 510 U.S. 471 (1994)).
8 Id. at 71-72.
9 Id. at 72.
10 Id. at 72-73.
11 Id. at 72.
12 Id. at 74.
13 Id.
14 Id. At one point, Malesko attempted to add the individuals allegedly responsible for his injuries to the suit as defendants, but they were dismissed on statute of limitations grounds. Id. at 65.
15 Id. at 79 n.6 (Stevens, J., dissenting).
16 Peoples v. CCA Detention Ctrs., 422 F.3d 1090, 1093 (10th Cir. 2005), vacated in relevant part by equally divided court, 449 F.3d 1097 (10th Cir. 2006) (en banc).
17 Id. at 1093.
18 Id. at 1093-94.
19 Id. at 1094.
20 Id.
21 Id. at 1094-95.
22 Id. at 1096.
23 Id. at 1100.
25 Peoples, 422 F.3d at 1100-01.
26 Id. at 1101.
27 Id.
28 Id. at 1102-03.
29 Id. at 1103.
30 Id. at 1109 (Ebel, J., dissenting).
31 Id. at 1110.
32 Id. at 1110-12.
33 Id. at 1112-13.
34 Id. at 1113.
35 Peoples v. CCA Detention Ctrs., 449 F.3d 1097 (10th Cir. 2006) (en banc).
36 Womble Carlyle represented the GEO Defendants in Holly v. Scott, but Mr. Numbers did not participate in the case.
38 Id.
39 Id.
40 Id.
41 Id. at 290.
42 Id. at 289 (quoting Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain, 542 U.S. 692, 727 (2004)).
43 Id. at 290.
44 Id.
45 Id. at 291 (emphasis in original) (quoting Lugar v. Edmondson Oil Co., 457 U.S. 922, 937 (1982)).
46 Id. (emphasis in original) (quoting Lugar, 457 U.S. at 936).
47 Id. at 292 (citing Moose Lodge No. 107 v. Irvis, 407 U.S. 163, 172 (1972)).
48 Id. at 291-92.
49 Id. at 292 (quoting Correctional Servs. Corp. v. Malesko, 534 U.S. 62, 82 (2001))
50 Id. at 293.
52 Holly, 434 F.3d at 293 (quoting Richardson, 521 U.S. at 405-07).
53 Id. at 293.
55 Holly, 434 F.3d at 293-94.
56 Id. at 294 (quoting West, 487 U.S. at 54).
57 Id.
58 Id.
59 Id. at 295.
60 Id. at 296.
61 Id. at 299 (Motz, J., concurring in judgment only).
62 Id. at 302-03.
63 Alba v. Monford, 517 F.3d 1249, 1251 (11th Cir. 2008).
64 Id. at 1251.
65 Id. at 1251-52.
66 Id. at 1254.
67 Id. (citing Correctional Servs. Corp. v. Malesko, 534 U.S. 62, 69

Engage: Volume 12, Issue 3
As this case never proceeded past the frivolity review stage at the district court, the facts are all taken from Pollard’s complaint and, presumably, would be denied in whole or in part by the defendants if the case moves forward.

At the time of the events set out in the complaint, the GEO Group, Inc. was known as Wackenhut Correctional Corporation. Pollard v. GEO Group, Inc., No. 07-16112, slip op. at 8147 n.2 (9th Cir. June 7, 2010).

The panel was comprised of The Honorable Proctor Hug, Jr. and Richard A. Paez of the Ninth Circuit and The Honorable Jane A. Restani, chief Judge of the United States Court of International Trade, sitting by designation.

Pollard v. GEO Group, Inc., No. 07-16112, slip op. at 8153 (9th Cir. June 7, 2010) (“We recognize that the former holding directly conflicts with the Fourth Circuit’s holding in Holly v. Scott and the latter conflicts with the Ninth Circuit’s holding in Alba v. Montford.”) (citations omitted).

Id. at 8152.

Id. at 8154.

Id. at 8154-55.

Id. at 8155 (citing West v. Atkins, 487 U.S. 42, 49-51 (1988)).

Id. at 8155-56 (quoting West, 487 U.S. at 57).

Id. at 8156.

Id. at 8157.

Id.

Id. at 8156.

Id. (quoting West, 487 U.S. at 55-56).

Id. at 8158.

Id. (quoting Richardson v. McKnight, 521 U.S. 399, 413 (1997)).

Id. at 8160 (citing Correctional Servs. Corp. v. Malesko, 534 U.S. 62, 65 (2001)).

Id. at 8159.

Id. (quoting West, 487 U.S. at 55).

Id. at 8160 (quoting Richardson, 521 U.S. at 416 (Scalia, J., dissenting)).

Id. (quoting Rendell-Baker v. Kohn, 457 U.S. 830, 842 (1982)).

Id. at 8161 (“Even where defendants have engaged in federal action, we do not always allow Bivens suits to go forward.”).

Id. at 8162-63 (quoting Willie v. Robbins, 551 U.S. 537, 550 (2007)).

even where the prisoner would face considerable procedural difficulties in filing a state action); Holly, 434 F.3d at 296-97 (holding by both the majority and Judge Motz’s concurrence that available state remedies defeat a Bivens action).

136 See Pollard, slip op. at 8164-66.

137 Mathis v. The GEO Group, Inc., No. 08-ct-00021 (E.D.N.C. filed May 28, 2008). Mr. Numbers represents The GEO Group Inc. in this litigation.

138 Mathis v. The GEO Group, Inc., No. 08-ct-00021, slip op at 7-13 (E.D.N.C. Sept. 29, 2010)

139 See Pollard, slip op. at 8157; Holly, 434 F.3d at 299 n.1 (Motz, J., concurring in judgment).

141 In mid-2007, 30,379 out of 199,118 total federal prisoners (15.2%) were held in privately-operated prisons, and the percentage has been steadily increasing annually. William J. Sabol & Heather Couture, Bureau of Justice Statistics Bulletin: Prison Inmates at Midyear 2007, at 1, 5 (2008), available at http://bjs.ojp.usdoj.gov/content/pub/pdf/pim07.pdf.

142 The Supreme Court has refused to extend Bivens to new circumstances in the seven opportunities it has had since 1980. Brief for Petitioners at 13, Minneci v. Pollard, No. 10-1104 (U.S. 2011).